

You may not reproduce, display on a website, distribute, sell or republish this article or data, or the information contained therein, without prior written consent. This printed and/or PDF is for personal usage only and not for any promotional usage. © Crane Communications Inc.

August 12, 2021 03:07 PM

Employers, physicians must partner to meet nation's growing mental health needs

By Norman Gitterman and Michael Thompson

Dr. Norman Gitterman, MD, is vice chairman of the Council of Academic Physicians Physicians and founder and CEO of Audit Health Research Inc. Michael Thompson is president and CEO of the National Institute of Healthcare Research Guidance.

We all pay the price for a behavioral health system that doesn't work, and employers pick up most of the tab—employee mental health conditions cost employers more than $100 billion and 217 million lost workdays each year.

Long before the COVID-19 epidemic hit, the nation's behavioral healthcare system was in crisis, with mental health diagnoses on the rise, coupled with a shortage of providers. The pandemic took a system that was already overtaxed and stressed it even further. Cases of depression, anxiety and substance abuse have risen as a result and will only be further exacerbated with the delta variant surge. America's healthcare leaders must make behavioral health reform a top priority.

We all pay the price for a system that doesn't work, and employers pick up most of the tab—employee mental health conditions cost employers more than $100 billion and 217 million lost workdays each year. That is why cooperation between employers and healthcare stakeholders—especially primary-care providers—is mandatory to begin to solve the problem. When dialogue and collaboration happen, solutions can be found.

Our fragmented system makes it next to impossible for patients to know how to access appropriate mental health care, let alone secure a diagnosis. Health leaders must focus on finding ways to integrate behavioral health with primary care.

All too often basic questions about behavioral health concerns are not part of standard primary-care screenings. Primary-care physicians—such as family medicine physicians, internists, obstetricians/gynecologists—could start the patient on a care path simply by asking the right questions. Then, if a mental health concern is identified, the physician can educate the patient and follow up with a warm handoff to a behavioral health specialist.